Interpersonal Psychotherapy :
Disruptive Thinking / Creative Clinical Practices

LEVEL E

Trainer:

Pr Scott Stuart, MD

Presentation :

Interpersonal Psychotherapy (IPT) is a time-limited individual psychotherapy focused on symptom relief and interpersonal functioning. IPT has been empirically demonstrated to be effective in the treatment of affective disorders and interpersonal problems, and has proved to be particularly helpful for women with depression during pregnancy and the postpartum. Pr. Stuart, along with his colleague Pr. Michael O'Hara, have been conducting research on IPT for perinatal women for over 15 years.

This course is designed to teach participants to teach other clinicians to use Interpersonal Psychotherapy. General principles and techniques for « teaching workshops » will be covered, with specific information about teaching IPT. The course will emphasize practice exercises and participant observation in small groups, and will also involve teaching experience with participant feedback.

The idea of this unique workshop comes from a highly qualified group of IPT trainers who worked together during the 2012 Level E course in La Teppe. Our aim is to continue to foster new, disruptive thinking and clinical creativity based on IPT principles. Scott Stuart will guide the sharing of experience and interactions of a motivated group of therapists, supervisors, and experienced IPT trainers.

The course is co-sponsored by the IPT Institute. It is open to all experienced clinicians who have an interest in IPT and supervision. A few number of motivated professionals with no prior exposure to IPT may be accepted, depending on places available. Those clinicians who are registered with the IPT Institute at Level D (Certified IPT Supervisor) are eligible to receive Level E accreditation (Certified IPT Trainer) after completing the course.

Pr Scott Stuart, MD
